Abstract. This article reviews studies aimed at elucidating the phenomenological model of the phenomenon of loneliness. Within the framework of phenomenology, various forms of loneliness associated with internal and external factors are studied. Based on the classification of loneliness developed by G. Kolbel and D. Gaev's views on loneliness, the specific features of this phenomenon are analyzed. The interactionist model of R. S. Weiss provides an opportunity to identify types of loneliness that arise as a result of a lack of social and emotional connections. This article reveals the universal and various levels of manifestation of loneliness, as well as its inextricable connection with social and interpersonal factors.

Keywords: the phenomenon of loneliness, phenomenological model, social loneliness, emotional loneliness, existential experience, personal awareness.

Annotatsiya. Ushbu maqola yolg'izlik tushunchasining fenomenologik modelini yoritishga qaratilgan tadqiqotlarni qamrab oladi. Fenomenologiya doirasida ichki va tashqi omillar bilan bog'liq bo'lgan yolg'izlikning turli shakllari o'rganiladi. G. Kolbel va D. Gaev tomonidan ishlab chiqilgan yolg'izlik haqidagi qarashlari tasnifi asosida ushbu hodisaning o'ziga xos xususiyatlari tahlil qilinadi. R. S. Vayssning interaksionistik modeli ijtimoiy va hissiy aloqalarning yetishmasligi natijasida paydo bo'ladigan yolg'izlik turlarini aniqlash imkonini beradi. Ushbu maqolada yolg'izlik namoyon bo'lishining universal va turli darajalari, shuningdek, uning ijtimoiy va shaxslararo omillar bilan uzviy bog'liqligi ochib berilgan.

Introduction. The phenomenological and existential approaches to loneliness share many similarities. Researchers who favor the phenomenological perspective view loneliness as a universal and all-encompassing experience. According to these scholars, the defining characteristic of loneliness is the deep sense of immersion in one's inner world. When the phenomenological element is linked to a cognitive aspect, it suggests that loneliness may be a unique form of self-awareness. This is reflected in the desire to belong to a group or to have contact with others. It is important to note that phenomenology regards experience as an intentionally constructed feeling. In discussing intention, phenomenology emphasizes that since experience is always connected to life's relationships and context, it cannot be purely subjective or internal. Intentional connections are dynamic, and within this framework, experience becomes a form of relationship. Thus, loneliness can disrupt the intentional structure of an individual, particularly in the intersubjective realm. The core of the loneliness phenomenon is "self-awareness."

Literature review and methodology. In this context, it is appropriate to consider the attempt of the German scientist G. Kolbel to systematize the experiences of loneliness. Loneliness is considered by him as a multifaceted phenomenon. The author created the following classification of types of loneliness: 1) loneliness causes an internal, uplifting, satisfying feeling; 2) internal loneliness, causing depression; 3) loneliness causes an external, uplifting, satisfying feeling; 4) loneliness causes external, depressing. Loneliness is internal positive - it means the ability of a person to live independently of others in conditions of personal spiritual autonomy, which is a sign of the moral strength of the individual. This is a form of «consciously chosen loneliness». Loneliness is internal, negative, causing depression and oppression, and is manifested in a sense of alienation from oneself and others, when a person doubts his significant identity. A person loses trust in other people and society. His faith is broken, G. Kolbel subjectively, a person has a very low estimate of the community. As a result, he feels lonely even among other people and does not trust them. [1]

Result and discussion. Loneliness depends on external, joy-causing, positive, external factors.

This can be felt in a mosque, a museum, when contemplating natural beauty, such as mountains, the sea, the forest, and the like. External loneliness, which causes depression and a depressed state, reveals an externally conditioned negative type of loneliness. It appears in response to significant losses for a person, such as, for example, a divorce or the death of a loved one. G. Kolbel's model describes the phenomenon of loneliness in its various spheres. The scientist emphasized the internal significance of this feeling. He was able to show the diversity of reasons that cause loneliness. Kolbel's views became the basis for the proposed dispositional model of loneliness. [2]

The American researcher D. Gaev holds a similar point of view. Loneliness is an inevitable consequence of human experience, which is reinforced by the reality of human existence. Having studied loneliness, D. Gaev analyzes society as a whole. Its specific features, such as the technologization of society, the rejection of traditions, the change in attitude towards the traditional family, frequent relocations, distrust of state and public structures, inevitably lead to a feeling of loneliness. The presence of these factors leads to the emergence of a feeling of one's own insignificance. Loneliness, says D. Gaev, is a negative experience. Gaev divides loneliness into pathological and existential. Existential is associated with separation from others and arises from the fact that the reality of human existence is self-evident. Pathological is understood as a constant separation from oneself and others due to the inability to build the necessary social interaction. Pathological loneliness and its following features are characterized by:

- 1) cognitive dissonance; 2) excessive shyness; 3) low self-esteem; 4) lack of meaning in life. [3]

In addition to the two main types, D. Gaev distinguishes 5 subtypes of loneliness. The first subtype is the loneliness of the inner «I». It is defined as a feeling of rejection of one's true self. It occurs due to the influence of public opinion. The second subtype - physical loneliness - refers to a feeling of longing caused by the lack of physical contact with a meaningful partner. The third subtype - emotional loneliness - is a complex state of despair associated with the inability to establish comfortable psycho-emotional contact with a partner. Such loneliness often occurs in marriage, when fading feelings are replaced by simple mechanical cohabitation. The fourth subtype - social loneliness is characterized by a feeling of sadness and longing, a feeling of one's own uselessness to the people around. In this case, both interpersonal barriers and external factors may be important. [2]

A person experiencing this subtype of loneliness suffers from a lack of social interactions that are important to him. The fifth subtype of loneliness - spiritual loneliness - represents a feeling of inner existential vacuum. A person is looking for the meaning of life and the purpose of his existence. The inner void is not filled only by satisfying material needs. In general, the peculiarity of the phenomenological model is that here the emergence of a lonely person in the social sphere is taken into account, but the main emphasis is shifted to interpersonal factors. Loneliness is felt as his «nakedness» in front of the social environment, as a loss or separation from his «I», or as a phenomenological inconsistency of ideas about the «I». As a result, there is a certain connection between self-awareness and loneliness. According to this concept, the antidote to loneliness can be self-awareness, which is the self-esteem of the individual, which makes a person independent of the opinions of others. Loneliness is considered a pathology that negatively affects the individual. The interactionist model of R. S. Weiss, a representative of this model, distinguishes between emotional and social loneliness. This typology is interesting because it speaks of the possibility of empirically studying the phenomenon of loneliness, which allows this concept to work. The lack of social and emotional connections is the main concept of R. S. Weiss's research. The scientist considers loneliness to be an affective state that can take two forms. The lack of attachment to a particular person as a result of the breakdown of friendship or close relationships is called emotional loneliness by R. S. Weiss. It is characterized by a feeling of anxious anxiety. [4]

A person experiencing emotional loneliness tends to experience a sense of loneliness, regardless of the presence of society. A person in this state perceives the world around him as meaningless and desolate. The expression of his loneliness can be complaints of inner emptiness, as well as apathy and personal anomie. The lack of social interaction, expressed in the absence of a sense of community and an existing social circle, causes social loneliness. It is characterized by a feeling of intentional rejection. Boredom and the meaninglessness of life are the main experiences of a person experiencing this type of loneliness. [1]

The loss of a sense of belonging and belonging to someone characterizes emotional loneliness, while the feeling of exclusion, abandonment characterizes social loneliness. This type of loneliness is often determined if the social roles of individuals are not taken into account. An example of this is a person with a disability or whose behavior is considered socially unacceptable. Such attributes of modern society as high fragmentation and mobility, blurring of social boundaries, disintegration of traditional groups, disregard for the individual's point of view are factors contributing to the emergence of social Loneliness. It should be noted that Weiss in his work identified six types of needs. Their satisfaction is associated with six social connections:

1. The need for close relationships. This need is associated with the presence of a close partner (love, marriage, friendship). A person feels confident and safe.

2. The need for a social circle. A person communicates with relatives, his team, friends and, at the same time, has joint activities, feels a sense of community, belonging to a group.

3. The need to care for another. This type of relationship is associated with a relationship that allows one to be responsible for another person, for example, the work of parents and children. A person feels necessary for others.

4. The need for confidence in one's own importance. This type of relationship is associated with such a relationship, in which a person recognizes his own vitality. For example, in order for a man to feel very psychologically comfortable in a family, you need to know that his wife highly values his qualities and achievements.

5. The need for friendship. In this case, we are talking about family ties or friendships that provide support under all circumstances. The individual feels trust and confidence in another person.

6. The need for patronage. This need corresponds to interactions with people who can provide the individual with the necessary protection. In this case, the individual feels safe and has the opportunity to turn to a chosen authority, for example, a father figure. [7]

Conclusion. In our view, Weiss's research can be expanded by adding the idea that his model could encompass a type of loneliness related to a lack of identity, which we refer to as "internal loneliness." Given that loneliness is seen as the outcome of the interaction between internal and external factors affecting an individual, the principles of Weiss's model also laid the groundwork for the development of a dispositional model. In this model, the primary causes of loneliness stem from external factors, particularly the current events in the individual's life.
